SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.

SERPENTINE

Named for it's fancied resemblance to the patterns of snake skin, Serpentine is a very common mineral. It is usually quite soft and can be easily carved. It has been used for thousands of years for ornamental carvings and jewelry. Its fibrous variety, Asbestos, has been used as heat insulation but is no longer used today.