TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.

TRILOBITE

The Trilobite was perhaps the most common inhabitant of Earth's primitive seas. Dozens of species of Trilobites have been identified and they existed for more than 200 million years before becoming extinct. Sometimes referred to as "mud bugs", Trilobites lived on or near the soft sea floor and probably ate the remains of other sea creatures which had died.